W. W. Norton - We the People, Tenth Edition
A republic is designed, not to prevent the people from governing, but to filter popular sentiment in ways that reduce the likelihood of hasty, ill-conceived, and injurious policies. To the framers, the Constitution's separation of powers and other limits on power were hallmarks of a republican form of government, as opposed to a democratic form, which places no limits on the majority.

POLS 155 Chapter 3: We the People- Chapter 3 - OneClass
People naturally tended to be corrupt, but a good government could be created if good people were cultivated, and many Americans believed this. However, Madison and his supporters believed that it would be hard and catastrophic to cultivate virtue; therefore, the best solution was to create a government that could function well even without virtuous people—one with separation of powers.
